The suspect in a mass shooting at a Kentucky church was killed by a police officer, the FBI said Monday, in the first known instance of a police officer using a robot to take down a person in a domestic shooting. It was the first known lethal use of a robot by any law enforcement agency. The suspect, who wasn't immediately identified, died in the officer's custody, the FBI said in a statement.

Greg Abbott told reporters. The police officer was "doing what he needed to do," Abbott said. "This is a tragedy and our hearts go out to the families who lost loved ones, those injured, and those affected in the most profound of ways by this cowardly act," he said. The shooter was wearing a "long-sleeved dark shirt with a floral print," and was "admitted as a patient to a hospital" after the incident, the FBI said. The hospital where the shooter was treated was not immediately identified. The police officer and his weapon were not harmed. "He executed this suspect with a robot," Thomas J. Dart, sheriff of 82157476af
